Lindqvist Outdoor Tent Range 2026

Choosing the right tent

A tent has to match the trips you actually take. A light tent for long hikes saves weight on every step, while a family tent for a fixed camp can afford more space and comfort. Before you choose, think about how many people will sleep in it, how much you will carry it and what weather you expect.

All tents in this range use a flysheet with a hydrostatic head of at least 3,000 millimetres, aluminium poles and taped seams. Every model is pitched outer first, so the inner tent stays dry when you set up in the rain.

Fjäll series

The Fjäll tents are built for hikers who count every gram. The single hoop design keeps the pole count low and the pack size small. Both vestibules are large enough to store a rucksack and boots out of the rain.

What we tested

We pitched every Fjäll prototype more than two hundred times in the mountains above Abisko. The tents held up in gusts of 22 metres per second when guyed out on all points.

Storm series

The Storm tents are made for winter and for exposed camps above the tree line. Crossing poles carry snow load, and the flysheet reaches all the way to the ground so that wind cannot get under it.

- Snow skirt on all sides
- Two entrances so you can always open on the lee side
- Ventilation that can be opened from inside without letting snow in

Hem series

The Hem tents are family tents for campsites and long stays. You can stand up inside, and the separate bedrooms can be removed to make one large living space.

Care and repair

Dry the tent completely before storing it, even after a short trip. Store it loosely in a cool place rather than in its stuff sack. If a pole or the fabric is damaged, our repair service in Östersund fixes most problems within two weeks.
